By the second half of the 15th century, Cuzco was the epitome of the empire known as Tawantinsuyu, the "land of four quarters." Radiating outward from Cuzco's central plazas was the Inca Road, a system of constructed royal conduits dotted with way stations (tambos) and storage facilities (qolqa) that reached the entire empire. The ceque system was a similar network of hypothetical ley lines, a set of pilgrimage routes radiating out from Cuzco to connect hundreds of shrines out in the provinces.
