"When you walk past someone or have an interaction where they can't see that smile because of a mask, you're losing something that conveys to other people that you're friendly and polite and approachable." Face masks hide what words can't say. While masks save lives, they also create social challenges and frictions.

Yes it does actually! It is known as a double negative, which is considered bad English. In Spanish for example, it is perfectly normal to use double negatives. They would say, "yo no veo nada" but it is not good English to say, "I don't see nothing", because logically, if you don't see nothing, you must be seeing something.

Does the English phrase 'I don't see nothing' mean you ...

This is a fairly common thing to hear, and it's pretty clear those saying it think they're paying you a compliment. But "don't worry, I don't see you as..." never ends with a positive statement. The most common way of ending that sentence is with something negative. "Lazy," "stupid," "bossy," "weak," whatever it is.
