Life insurance companies do not outline a timescale, so you can start a claim after a few weeks or more if you need the time to grieve. When you call to make a claim, the insurer will have trained staff to deal with your situation sympathetically, making it easier to start a claim soon after the death.

Life insurance companies make money by selling a product for more than it costs to provide, and by investing the cash they need to hold onto. It's a robust business model that helps to explain the size and longevity of many life insurance companies. That doesn't mean life insurance companies make profits at the expense of customers.
