TELL US WERE HOME by Marina Budhos is a devastating powerful story that quietly sliced me up and left me bleeding. I've experienced the discomfort of feeling like I don't belong. I don't know why certain kids seem to develop an inclination toward exclusion and seem determined to make sure others know that they don't belong.

Summary and reviews of Tell Us We're Home by Marina Budhos

It's the typical story of middle school BFFs—all immigrants. Ridiculously, unfairly, that makes all the difference in the lives of Lola from Slovakia, Maria from Mexico and Jaya from Trinidad. The daughters of maids and nannies, these eighth graders navigate young adulthood in an upscale suburb. Though their concerns include everyday American adolescent angst (having the right dress for ...

Crossing Over aims to capture what all writers do: we cross over into territory both familiar and unknown. I grew up in Queens, NY, in Parkway Village, a community built for U.N. families, and a haven for international, mixed, and American families during the ferment of civil rights and social change.
